

I think that allowing this would be a very bad move for the future of HDTV and now is the most critical time of this transition and forcing Voom to cease offering service and allowing Dish Network to use a satellite that most likely wouldn't be used for HDTV given their track record would be a big mistake. All across the country many cable companys and dbs companies haven't shown great progress in national HDTV offerings even though many are out there and forcing Voom to stop offering service will sure allow other companies to slow down their HDTV offerings. As always the more companies offering HDTV services the better and I think most of all this would greatly hurt the government as far as ending the DTV transition as quickly as it could.